Who is your favorite Author and why?

Sarah J. Maas because her writing style is similar to mine.

What genre do you prefer to read?

Fantasy because realistic books just aren't interesting to me.

Where do you learn about books you might want to read in the future?

From my parents when they talk about books.

Where do you like to read best?

In a tree since it is peaceful, the higher up I am.

When is your favorite time of the day to read and why?

Afternoon when I climb in the trees and at night since reading helps me fall asleep.

Throne of Glass by Sarah J. Maas. A greatly-feared assassin, Celaena Sardothien, gets captured. She was sent to Endovier, where slaves are sent, as a death sentence. The Crown Prince went to Endovier to offer Celaena her freedom if she agrees to become his champion and compete in a competition to become the King's champion. After she won she would only have to serve four years as champion. With the events that happened during the competition she learned some people can be trusted but many cannot.

When Celaena agreed Prince Dorian took her to the castle. Then some of the champions started dying, one by one a few nights before each test. Celaena finds a secret passage that can be used to spy, or to go down to a forgotten tomb of queen, Elena, whom Celaena receives missions from that she accidentally completed her own accord. Read to find out whether or not Celaena wins the competition!

I would recommend this book to those who are fans of the hunger games and would like something a little more in depth. I liked this book because it gives you little information so you can piece things together along with the character.
